ABSTRACT

In this thesis, the researcher has attempted to compare the English and Maithili verbs that are related to actions performed by different parts of the body and find out the similarities and differences. The researcher has also compared and contrasted the semantic description of the verbs of both languages using componential analysis approach.

Data for the English verbs were collected from various dictionaries and thesauruses. Similarly, data for the Maithili verbs were collected by the researcher himself. The ten Maithili native speakers who were educated and adult and also available in Kathmandu were consulted for the primary sources of data. Books and articles related to the Maithili language were also consulted for the secondary sources.

One of the major findings of this study is that Maithili verbs are structurally complex compared to English verbs. They generally end with ‘-nai’ (eg, Khe-nai, pi-nai, je-nai, etc.) which is the distinctive feature of Maithili.

The study has been divided into four chapters: introduction, methodology, analysis and interpretation and findings and recommendations. Each of them has been divided into various sub-chapters.

The first chapter consists of introduction with general background, review of the related literature, objectives of the study and significance of the study.

The second chapter includes methodology. It is sub-divided into sources of data which is further sub-divided into primary sources and secondary sources, tools and procedure of data collection and limitations of the study.

The third chapter deals with analysis and interpretation of data.

The fourth chapter comprises findings, recommendations and pedagogical implications.
